Most films and television programs also have their storyboards translated into various languages for international audiences, although it is common to find films created in the original language with subtitles. The films that are dubbed are referred to as being "internationalized. " This method is often used for projects that might have a large international audience. Sometimes, as with animated films, actors' voices are recorded in one country and the rest of the production takes place in another country. In several countries, foreign language TV programs are dubbed, as well as music videos and commercials. In some countries such as France or Latin America , it is common not to dub but to subtitle the original sound. In that case, the original singer's/composer's work is released as a single song with a different translation for each version. In the case of films, an English-language soundtrack is often produced along with the film. The music label or label produces a copy of the movie or TV show and puts it up on sale as a soundtrack. In some cases, this allows those who cannot understand the language of the film to still enjoy it. This practice is common in countries such as Mexico and Brazil that have large cultural differences from those in Europe or North America . Sometimes, the soundtrack is released in another language, but the film remains only in the original language. An example of this was Brazilian singer Alexandre Pires' film "The Sound of Music", which was released with English subtitles under the title "The Sound of Music".
