A: There's no relationship between the creators of a project and the license. Since the license is CC-0, any person can download the project and tweak it as they see fit. The creators of the project can sue them, but they can't block their behavior because it's not their work. A: As was pointed out in a comment, your question actually has nothing to do with copyright. You're asking for a legal interpretation of a license. First, let's cover CC0. In this context, you're probably aware that there's no copyright to begin with. It's a license, but it's not a copyright. CC0 has absolutely no requirement to provide any attribution, and it allows for any private use. It's pretty much a free for all. It allows for all types of public and private redistribution, and even permits commercial use. Here's the actual legal definition The Creative Commons Zero license is a free, public domain dedication. The only condition is that the original author is attributed and linked to when redistributed. Here's the practical meaning It really doesn't matter what the original author did or didn't do. You could have a project with a copyright assignment from the original author, or you could be using it totally as a CC0. It's not required to do anything. This type of license is perfectly legal, and allows others to copy and redistribute or commercialize your work as they see fit. Here's the legal definition It's not a license. It's a copyright license. The purpose is to allow the original author to do what they want with the project, while letting others do what they want with it. A: I'm the original author of Contaplug Elite 2012, and I didn't have to do anything to get CC0 licensing. If I understood correctly, you are in the USA, and so you can download Contaplug Elite 2012 as long as you don't make any money off of it. Dave and Tracey decided to upgrade from the Lighting GT to the Lighting FC4 since they are using a Black and Decker OXY510 to power their lathe. They installed the FC4 and made some test cuts. Unfortunately, the FC4 is not waterproof as far as they can tell. So before building the rest of their woodworking center, they contacted us d4474df7b8
