Congenital plasmalogen deficiency is a newly defined autosomal recessive disorder of lysophosphatidylcholine acyltransferase. To our knowledge, two cases of this disease have been described in the literature so far. In both siblings the first symptoms occurred in early childhood and included irritability, lethargy, and vomiting. One sibling was referred to our hospital at the age of 3 years with signs of brainstem and pyramidal dysfunction. The other sibling was reported with head nodding and seizures and a diagnosis was made at the age of 6 months. Both patients died before the age of 2 years, one of the siblings died after a rather long disease period. In the second sibling, by means of a plasmalogen deficiency screening, a disease-causing mutation in the LPCAT2 gene was detected, which suggests that the described disease is caused by genetic defects in the plasmalogen pathway. Besides the earlier onset and the much more severe phenotype, the clinical course was also markedly different in the two siblings, since the second sibling died within a few weeks.Roles of the P450 monooxygenase CYP3A4 in drug-induced liver injury. To assess the roles of P450 cytochromes (CYPs) in the pathogenesis of drug-induced liver injury (DILI). Selected case-controlled studies were identified using MEDLINE database (1980-present), EMBASE (1980-present), and the Cochrane Controlled Trials Register (up to May 2009). For the CYP3A4-mediated DILI, the following terms were used: DILI, P450 cytochrome, and liver. Twenty-two studies were included in the meta-analysis. The risk ratios (RRs) for the incidence of DILI with respect to CYP3A4
