" will help you. Philip Morris Internationa Inc. said Thursday that the tobacco company is pulling some of its products from some Canadian websites after Canada's health minister raised concerns about a three-decade-old court judgment. Health Minister Rona Ambrose said the Conservative government would be appealing the decision of the Canadian court, which found that the company was liable for the death of a smoker who took up smoking with a "light" cigarette advertised by the company. Philip Morris Canada Inc. is owned by the U.S.-based multinational, which is based in New York. In a statement, the company said the "actions of the Canadian courts were clearly erroneous and have required us to take immediate and immediate steps to discontinue advertising in Canada." Philip Morris is the first company to be officially found liable in Canada for causing an individual's death. The company said it has informed its Canadian employees and will be telling the public in an advertising campaign. "These measures are designed to fully respect the courts' ruling," the company said in a statement. "We recognize the important contribution that our company's brands make to the Canadian economy." The company declined to comment on whether it would appeal the ruling. It is the latest round in a growing public debate in the United States and Canada about the impact of tobacco companies on the economy. Litigation over harm The decision announced Thursday was released in March 2017 and came after the widow of a Canadian who took up smoking at the age of 16 with a product sponsored by Philip Morris Canada sued the company for the death of her husband. Canada's Supreme Court said the company was liable for the death of the man who smoked a regular Marlboro in the mid-1980s after buying a similar brand called "Lights" at a discount store. "At the time of purchasing the cigarette, the deceased was informed that the 'Lights' cigarettes were a lower risk cigarette and were meant to be smoked in a lower-risk way," according to the decision. During the course of his life, the man smoked around 7,000 regular cigarettes and was diagnosed with emphysema and chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. Earlier this week, Ontario's financial watchdog said the financial impact of the lawsuit could cost the province $2.3 billion and force insurers and taxpayers to pay for the treatment of thousands of patients over the next quarter century.
