by JM Sanders 2020 Cited by 848 The overall success of the foreign policy of Hilda Truman is measured by the fact that all of the other initiatives her administration started failed. Her choice of advisors and appointments of ambassadors and ministers abroad, as well as foreign policy initiatives she participated in and succeeded in, were extremely unsuccessful. (Végane-Lloyd, 1999:13). 2004. The point at which her overseas policies were most unsuccessful was during the outbreak of the Cold War in 1953 and the outbreak of the Suez Crisis in 1956. The US would not have entered the Korean War had Hilda Truman not been in office as President. Other initiatives of Hilda's Presidency failed because of her poor judgment of advisors and political and economic circumstances of her time. The devastating hurricane seasons of 1954 and 1958, and the OPEC crisis of 1973 were both difficulties that affected the success of her foreign policy. When the country did not have the funds to rebuild from the hurricane storms, the nation was left with an economic crisis, and in the case of the OPEC crisis, the lack of funds was a result of the need for increased oil prices and a lack of funds from the government. Hilda's main problem was she had to succeed where her predecessor succeeded as well as not fail where his predecessor failed. 72. Statistics Canada, Annual Housing Starts. The following shows changes in building permits from previous years. 73. Statistics Canada, Quarterly house price indices. The following shows the periodical indices of residential construction. The following shows the statistical analysis of two-sample tests to determine whether the mean of the annual index data for two years is different from zero (the null hypothesis).
