Category:Anthropology booksI guess in the last two weeks the central banks of the world have figured out that there is no other way to stop the next market plunge other than to buy stocks and bonds. Although that seems to be the only reason as of now, it's not a guarantee.
They could be trying to buy time to see what happens before taking bigger action. What we have now though is a rare situation where the Fed is really doing the things they said they were doing (buying treasuries and cutting the fed funds rate), yet we have a market that seems to be headed higher, so they're in a holding pattern. I was talking to a guy at work on Friday, and he is concerned about the global economy as a whole. I told him that the problem isn't a domestic problem, it's a global problem, and it's one that will last longer than just a week or a month. The problem is that it's a 20 year problem that has begun to manifest itself. Sure, you can see the effects here and there, but the biggest factor is that the problems are always long term. The problems always end up being too big to be resolved in a reasonable amount of time. It takes more time than it should to fix. We will see, I suppose. In the meantime, the people that bought on the dip should continue to ride it as long as they can, because it is likely that they will be in for a much bigger shock when it finally ends. Here's an article that talks about why some countries have decided to default on their sovereign debt. It's long, but if you want to know why the eurozone is in a fix, this is as good a place as any to start. The euro zone debt crisis has been described as an American financial crisis, but it's nothing like the real crisis America's housing and auto industries face. The euro zone crisis is not the result of huge corporate excesses. There are no wild subprime mortgages or car companies on the brink of collapse. In the United States, household debt levels are soaring, the housing market is in a slump and the government is already spending more than a trillion dollars to deal with the fallout of the financial crisis. Instead, the euro zone has been rocked by the crisis of socialism: unsustainable policies imposed by national governments that have contributed to the collapse of the private banking sector in their countries. The crisis in the euro zone is much bigger than the crisis in the United 2d92ce491b
