Tailored fibrin-collagen scaffolds: preparation and use for liver and corneal repair. With a view to replacing injured liver or cornea with autologous tissue, fibrin-collagen scaffolds (FCSs) were prepared from cryostored blood. The ideal fibrin-collagen scaffold for liver repair is thin, flexible, and readily adaptable to the anatomical location of the defect and has been prepared by combining the FCS with a fibrin-thrombin gel. In this study, a lumen was developed to enhance blood flow through the scaffold and, thereby, reduce the potential for thrombosis and limit the rate of degradation. Liver tissue repair was assessed in three separate studies: (i) by implanting the FCS in a bone marrow transplant in a rat liver model and examining the dynamics of regeneration; (ii) by grafting the FCS alone into a 30% partial hepatectomy model in a rat; and (iii) by implanting FCS in a 70% hepatectomy model in a rat and assessing tissue regeneration. The results of these studies indicated that the FCS is a suitable scaffold for liver repair; that the presence of a lumen in the FCS did not result in any detrimental effects; and that by implanting the FCS alone into a 30% partial hepatectomy model, regeneration of tissue was obtained. Finally, in a 70% hepatectomy model in a rat, the FCS was able to withstand removal of 70% of the liver mass. These data indicate that FCS is an effective scaffold for liver repair and that it has potential use in corneal surgery.
