While the tradition of having songs playing in a film is hardly a new idea, today we're talking about where the music comes from and how it's produced. There are a few podcast episodes we can point to as examples of this type of conversation, including a recent episode of the Movie Mistakes podcast, where the team gave us a history of songs that appeared in movies. But that's not quite what we're talking about here. Today, we're talking about film music, as in the music that plays in the background, and how it was produced. We're featuring a pair of interviews with our friends Michael Rogoway and Jonny Crowder. Jonny is the producer and owner of Bengie Music, the company responsible for the music for many films and TV shows, including "Lost," "Fringe," "The Exorcist," "Vampire Diaries," "24," "Sons of Anarchy," and many more. And Michael is the music editor for Film Music Reporter, where he has interviewed musicians and producers on the business side of film music, including singer-songwriters Rufus Wainwright, Adam Cohen, and Ethan Eubanks. Here's what they have to say. Michael Rogoway The passion for the music onscreen, in the music itself, comes from the same place as the interest in the work of its creators. And to really understand the film music we love, we need to learn the stories of its composers. For example, I've done some interviews with composer Nathan Barr, and he talks about his work on "Big Fish." It's a different kind of movie, and it's not just the 2d92ce491b
