Many of the stresses that affect individuals in the community are not visible to the clinician. It is not always possible to distinguish between the direct effect of the stressors on the individual and their indirect effect through the depressives. This paper reviews the different types of stressors that have been studied in relation to depression and the different categories of depressives. It is argued that the 'lack of response' to stressors in the community is a feature of a more fundamental problem: the lack of response of the individual to stressors. It is suggested that in these circumstances a major role for treatment is to enable the individual to develop the ability to respond to stressors. The paper concludes that the lack of response of the individual to stressors is not a characteristic of depression but rather is a general response of the individual to stressors. The paper argues that treatment of depressives should be directed to assisting the individual in developing this ability. The present invention relates to a method of fabricating a semiconductor device, and more particularly, to a method of fabricating a semiconductor device capable of minimizing a short channel effect. As the integration density of semiconductor devices increases, a channel length of a MOS transistor becomes shorter. The short channel effect is known as a characteristic of a MOS transistor having a short channel length. The short channel effect causes a deterioration of transistor characteristics, such as a short channel effect. In order to suppress the short channel effect, a pocket implantation process is widely used to control a channel length. However, if the pocket implantation process is used, the threshold voltage of the MOS transistor is undesirably decreased. Thus, it is required to develop a method capable of suppressing the short channel effect while maintaining the threshold voltage of the MOS transistor.
