Everyone outside of China takes their time to hit their glyphs. Chinese people, as a whole, know more than the average well-rounded Japanese person. You could be in Tokyo, London, New York, you can be in any country and they would still know more characters. Chinese people don't really get much sympathy for having to study. D: If you had a few extra hours every day to learn a new language, what would you do? Y: I would find a cool recipe, and then translate it. You can search Google for a fancy recipe and then translate it in Chinese, and your friends would think you are genius. I would spend the day figuring out how to make that recipe, follow the recipe, and then make it. You have to consider that I am learning Chinese right now. I haven't learned to cook. There is no stock or salt or salt, so I wouldn't know what to do. I would have to ask a friend, or maybe just figure it out. There's so much culture in cooking, that people still run out and buy a book. Why not buy one in Chinese? D: You once said that you wish that the Japanese could have a multi-millennial diet before the Japanese introduced the rice-based diet, and all the spices they added to it. Y: As you get older, you see how our ancestors ate. It's good to go back and learn your ancestral cuisine. Japanese food started to change after the Meiji restoration. It started taking on western influence. A lot of the dishes you see now are actually based on American and Western cooking. I've also read that the Japanese derived kombu and kelp from dishes they ate in China, but I don't buy that. It's not like they were eating too many vegetables, it was just a cultural thing. It's like saying Germans got their courage from the Turks. There were a lot of interactions with the Chinese, but I've never seen anything that suggested that, and there wasn't any information around. D: What advice would you give to someone wanting to learn Chinese? Y: Try to figure out what ba244e880a
