Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to controlling the power consumption of a device. More particularly, the present invention relates to controlling the power consumption of a device based on a data usage profile of the device, which is used for calculating the power usage of a data network traffic. 2. Background Art Many mobile devices used for wireline and wireless communication utilize a data network for downloading and uploading data to and from the device. For example, a wireless mobile phone may use a wireless data connection for downloading/uploading data to and from a data network of a cellular carrier, or a laptop computer may use a wired connection to a router to connect to a data network of the Internet. Conventional data network traffic management systems allow service providers to track and analyze network traffic by monitoring the various network connections used by end users, e.g., the cellular connections used by mobile phones. End users are typically charged per usage in units referred to as "minutes." One important aspect of network management is to accurately measure usage in order to accurately charge end users. Furthermore, users
