Garcia Márquez wrote “One hundred years from now, people will remember us for our battles, not for our schools of architecture.” If that’s a century from now, the engineers who designed and built our bridges and dams in the late 19th and early 20th centuries might agree. Their buildings are ugly, often on purpose — double-starved art museums, fortress-like, and void of grandeur. Take the Troy-Savannah Bridge, a Depression-era steel and concrete bridge spanning the Savannah River between Georgia and South Carolina. Raised in 1937 and 1937, the bridge is the only one designed by the Missouri office of the American Bridge Company and also the least well known. Don’t expect to see a row of ornate entries along I-10 between Tampa and Orlando on the way to Disney World, because the bridge is exactly that — unassuming, plain, but magnificent. Most of the public paid little attention to the bridge; it’s so short, at just 3.5 miles, and most traffic headed to the far north of the city anyway. But for those who pass by, the bridge is an engineering marvel. A mile downstream on the Savannah River, the bridge connects two parts of a massive engineering project, a dam that created the Lake Ballard-Lake Revere dam system, a series of dams between the two lakes that has nearly completely eliminated the free flow of water through the river. The fact that Lake Ballard is now a reservoir instead of a free-flowing river is also a double advantage for
