Q: How does a credit card use another credit card for authentication? How does a credit card use another credit card for authentication? If that credit card is stolen and then used in the store, how will the store know that the person who presented the stolen credit card wasn't the rightful owner? A: The credit card company processes the transaction and when the merchant is notified that this is not the owner, they block it. If it's used again at a different merchant, the merchant would have to block the customer's account on the other card and issue a refund to the original transaction. In Europe, the merchant must notify the credit card company within 48h of each fraudulent transaction. Stolen credit cards rarely get used for transactions by the thief. The process I described is used for the obvious reasons - not being the rightful owner makes sense. But the theft usually is quick. If the thief tries to use the card at a store, it would most likely get declined because the merchant wouldn't bother calling the credit card company and would rather shut the transaction down. Q:

Passing data to an Angular Component through SASS/SCSS

I want to pass an array to an angular component. The component will iterate through the passed array and display a list to the user. In a basic HTML page, the following will work, but I cannot get it to work in an Angular component.

{{testArray}} testArray: Array = ['test1', 'test2', 'test3']; I tried the following code in SASS, where I have the angular component as a mixin. @mixin loop( $amount ) { $count: 0;

@for $i from 1 through $amount { $count: $count + 1; &.ng-
scope { #{ $i } { 3da54e8ca3
