Clinical and experimental studies have shown that many airway diseases are associated with both structural and functional alterations of the tracheobronchial tree. Although anatomical models of the human tracheobronchial tree have been developed previously using CT and MRI data, the effect of regional anatomic differences on the transport of airborne pollutants, including particulate matter, has not been studied. To characterize the effect of regional anatomy on airway ventilation we applied a three-dimensional (3-D) model of the lower lung regions in a well-validated transport model of the entire respiratory tract.
