Pointer to a class instance, subclass/superclass If I have a class like this: class Apple { int someField; void someFunc() int someOtherField; } | If I create an instance of Apple, and try to access someField or someOtherField in someFunc(), would they both be accessible or do I need to cast the pointer to the correct type? Thank you A: They would be accessible. If you access them via the pointer, you do not have to cast it. But if you want to access them via the pointer, you must also cast it. A: In this specific case, the class has no data members so the pointers will be the same size, meaning no cast is required. Where a class has data members, the pointers will be different and casting would be required. DESCRIPTION: (Verbatim from the Applicant's Abstract) Although the chemotherapeutic approaches are modest in their effect
