On Tuesday, a San Francisco Superior Court jury convicted the former owner of a Davis, California marijuana dispensary, Karen Steward, of stealing $124,000 from her dispensary's bank account. Steward was the only witness in her defense. She testified that she left her company, Harborside, the successful cannabis dispensary she owned in Oakland, California, for three years because it was "too expensive." According to her legal team, Steward was worried about the future of cannabis, as most states have enacted new laws making it harder to operate a marijuana business. A manager of a competing dispensary, who was also on trial with Steward, was convicted of embezzling $400,000. On Tuesday, Steward was found guilty of the lesser charge of embezzlement, but was found not guilty of a felony count of conspiracy to commit money laundering.

"This is the largest embezzlement case in California history," said US Attorney Melinda Haag. "Prosecutors are seeking a sentence that reflects the gravity of the defendant's crime." The jury took two days to deliberate their decision, and Steward's sentence will be handed down next month.

Beyond the Ghosts of the Past: Hyperrealistic Computer-Generated Scans and Theories of Art History. Digital technologies offer new methods of art historical analysis and object characterization, and these methods are increasingly used in museum conservation. Recent advancements in scanning and computer-generated models that use photogrammetric technologies have generated new technologies for the study of art history. These technologies have been used to map works of art and to characterize physical attributes of works of art, providing information about their condition, provenance, and appraisal value. This article reviews these technologies, their applications in the study of art history, and their limitations. The applications of these new technologies are discussed and their limitations are examined. While these tools have been used to generate models of artworks, the use of these tools for analysis is limited due to the absence of a generally accepted ontology or vocabulary for the description of artworks. Although digitization is the preferred method of object analysis, it is proposed that object analysis will be greatly enhanced by the addition of an art ontology and terms, and that this will only be possible with the use of a universally
