By having robust reverse DNS, you'll be able to mitigate a huge number of attacks that is yet to come. And that's the type of protection you would want for your website. By having robust reverse DNS, your domain will be known, and a good portion of attacks that is yet to come would be easily mitigated. But what is robust reverse DNS? In short, reverse DNS is the feature that keeps you informed about the IP addresses of the end users who access your website. Once you have it, you have the ability to trace an attack done by a botnet and pinpoint the culprit responsible for the attack. This is because the ip address of the end user will be available in his records. You can then use that information to identify the source and see if the IP is already known. If it's a new IP address, then it can be traced back to the source. It doesn't matter if your website is protecting its users with Secure Sockets Layer and encrypted information. If an attack is done with a DDoS botnet, you'd still be able to trace it to an IP address. So if you want to make sure that your website can withstand the onslaught from DDoS bots, robust reverse DNS is the solution for your security needs. Here's why you need Reverse DNS: Better "Statics" One key element that Robtex's DDoS Mitigation service provides is what's called "statics".
