Main menu Post navigation Cesar Millan It was a surprise that a blog post meant to generate an interesting discussion would elicit a back-handed compliment. Usually I blog to provoke an interesting or controversial discussion. I can count on one hand the number of bloggers I have read or followed over the years that are trolls. This week I have been complimented by this man, known for his incredible bond with dogs, and his considerable marketing savvy. He has visited Australia multiple times and stays here once a year. I am sure he knows that we read his blog. I was doing a little twitter sifting of the papers for discussion last week. All of the major papers had the same article entitled Cesar Millan endorses weight loss to remove wrinkles. The Cesar thing is a façade, a marketing gimmick. He doesn't own a business and he doesn't advise or sell products. I always tell people it is like a doctor recommending weight loss to a fat person. I don't have any suggestions for weight loss. I have no interest in selling anything. I am curious about dogs and that's the only thing I write about. In his twitter comments, Cesar linked to this article. It seems that he does not agree that we should be obsessed with self-perfection. I get the absurdity of Cesar's reasoning. He says a dog would scratch at his rear because he is a pooper and a dog wants to lick it. I don't have a dog so I cannot answer that directly. I do know that the human condition seems to create and maintain an internal environment that can be a trigger to inflict 09e8f5149f
