55 collection of 256x256...Hydrogenotrophic methanogens and hydrogenosomes in anaerobic bacteria: life in symbiosis. Hydrogenotrophic methanogens are found in many microorganisms but are also associated with plant pathogenic, and with parasitic protozoa and intracellular bacteria, and in some anaerobic prokaryotes such as sulfate-reducing and fermenting bacteria. The intimate associations between the methanogens and their host are closely related to the existence of hydrogenosomes in which H₂ is produced, and the existence of symbiotic hydrogenotrophic methanogenesis in which H₂ serves as the substrate for methanogenesis. The symbiotic systems consist of the methanogen and the hydrogenosome as an integral organelle. It is suggested that the symbiotic hydrogenotrophic methanogenesis is of great importance for the survival of methanogens in the anoxic environment of their host. Q: why sed treats number starting from 1 as hex? This is sed syntax that I wrote: echo 1>file.txt sed -e '1,^[0-9]/d' -e '$d' file2.txt and I got this output: 0000000 00000000 00000000 I am reading my output file on a Ubuntu 16.04 machine with sed version 4.2.1. What is the problem with my syntax? A: Your problem is that you are using the wrong character class. Instead of [0-9], you should use [0-9] (note the square brackets). Also, you need to negate the expression in the second -e, as you don't want to delete any lines that match. Here is the correct syntax: sed -e '1,^[0-9]!/d' -e '$d' file2.txt Q: Can I use shared_ptr for custom datatypes? I have a class which holds a custom datatype, say, int. And I know that std::shared_ptr will work well with the standard library. But can I also use it with my custom type, because they are "special"? A: Yes, shared_ptr can be used with anything. And you can use weak_ptr too. You can specialize the pointer smart
