The images for this page were made by Frank Lewis, one of Britain's leading bird photographers, using a ringtail macaque to trigger reactions in the owls. The owl was subsequently released unharmed. As a result of the following morning's display the owls showed no ill effect and were released the following day. The use of a monkey in such situations is quite contrary to orthodox ethno-ornithological practice and we believe that it will be of little benefit to the image. The subject cannot be afforded the protections afforded to other wild animals and in the case of a species such as owls which hold the public in high regard and for which there are hardly sufficient funds to protect them it is almost beyond repair. The practice is also in contradiction to the ethos of an ethno-ornithological investigation as it is employed here in the interests of quality rather than common cause, as if the publicity such investigations acquire in the mass media serves any purpose.
