... More »The invention relates to an alarm triggering apparatus, and in particular, to such an apparatus for triggering one or more alarms, such as a fire alarm, upon the detection of a liquid spill. In the prior art there are various mechanical and electronic devices for detecting a spill of a fluid onto a floor, and for triggering an alarm upon such detection. In one example, the alarm triggers are actuated by a weight which is moved in response to the movement of the spilled liquid. There are many drawbacks to this type of triggering device. For example, the required sensitivity of such an apparatus may be unsatisfactory, such that a spill might be missed by the sensing device. Furthermore, should the apparatus be installed too low, or be installed too close to the floor, there may be a danger of tripping the triggering device. Further still, in case of a liquid spill that moves slowly along the floor, the triggering device may trigger the alarm after a substantial period of time, during which a fire and/or health hazard may have occurred. In another example, the alarm may be triggered by a light which is activated in response to the movement of the liquid. Again, there are drawbacks to this type of triggering device. For example, the alarm may be triggered when the spilled liquid is not actually present on the floor, or when the liquid has not been present for a sufficient period of time. A further drawback is that the sensitivity of such a device may be varied, resulting in a corresponding variation in the time required to trigger the alarm. In view of the foregoing, it is an object of the present invention to provide an alarm triggering apparatus that does not have the drawbacks or disadvantages of the prior art. Another object is to provide an alarm triggering apparatus which can detect a spill of liquid as well as the extent of the liquid spill. Yet another object is to provide such an apparatus which does not activate an alarm when a spill of a liquid is not present on the floor. A further object is to provide such an apparatus which activates an alarm more quickly when a spill of a liquid is present. Still another object is to provide such an apparatus which is not activated when liquid is spilled on the floor by a cleaning or maintenance personnel. Still a further object is to provide such an apparatus which is relatively inexpensive to manufacture and easy to operate.Q: Use IList instead of
