None of the information provided or references cited is admitted to be prior art to the present invention. Tumor cells must proliferate more quickly than normal cells, and must evade immune destruction. The malignant process is a series of steps by which genetically mutated cells accumulate through the process of clonal expansion. The cells also often acquire a number of other "hallmarks" including resistance to apoptosis, insensitivity to antigens (immunosuppression), promotion of angiogenesis, invasion and metastasis, and suppression of antitumor immunity. The invention of new and better drugs that target key aspects of the malignant process is one way of improving the survival of cancer patients. The invention of angiogenesis inhibitors (AI) in the 1980s has led to significant improvements in the survival of breast, lung, colon, and prostate cancer patients. Three main classes of angiogenesis inhibitors have been developed. The first are the anti-VEGF (vascular endothelial growth factor) agents, which are angiogenesis inhibitors
