Macrophages play a vital role in the clearance of neoplastic cells and products of cellular damage. We have designed and synthesized three novel Gd chelates that have high uptake by activated macrophages. The trihydroxamate ligand Gd-6-aminohexanoic acid (NIDA) displayed specific uptake in cells that have been activated with macrophage colony stimulating factor (M-CSF). The weakly binding trihydroxamate Gd-6-aminohexanohydroxamic acid (HIDA) was very stable in plasma and was targeted preferentially to spleen and liver; its uptake was blocked by pretreatment of mice with HIDA or liposome-encapsulated HIDA. The strong binding agent Gd-6-aminohexanoic acid carboxylate (NIH-FA) was internalized by activated macrophages and targeted preferentially to liver, spleen and lymph nodes. Specificity for activated macrophages was demonstrated by blocking experiments using ¹¹¹In-NIH-FA in a tumor bearing murine model. Pharmacokinetic studies with ¹¹¹In-NIH-FA in normal mice showed persistence in liver, spleen and bone marrow for at least 48 hours post injection. Pharmacokinetic studies in tumor bearing mice showed liver to be the major organ containing radioactivity for 3 days post injection. In tumor bearing mice, the biodistribution of ¹¹¹In-NIH-FA in tumors was significantly higher than that of ¹¹¹In-NIDA. Our data indicate that ¹¹¹In-NIH-FA is a promising agent for imaging macrophages activated in vivo.Optimal cell design using a robust dynamic programming approach. In this paper, we apply a robust dynamic programming approach to cope with uncertainty regarding the optimal parameter values of a partially observable nonlinear system. The approach takes advantage of (1) a robust approximation algorithm which provides lower and upper bounds
