The case of nearly two dozen criminals who tried to storm the International Court of Justice in the Hague last year is an extraordinary one. In short, the men travelled from the Netherlands to carry out an execution. They were captured on camera as they attempted to break into the United Nations building, where meetings are held. They were wearing protective clothing and holding "live" – not blanks – rounds of ammunition. The footage was taken by a security camera in the lower hall of the building. A guard spotted the suspects and called the police. The only person injured in the incident was one of the attackers, who dropped his weapon when he was struck by a guard who had jumped on him. It's been reported that all of the attackers were wounded during the incident. Is this the first time that this has happened? In 2011, a prisoner in Yemen tried to evade guards and shoot his way out of a prison. He shot himself in the leg. In 2008, a prisoner in a Mexican prison tried to escape by jumping a fence. He was shot dead by guards as he clambered over the fence. Is this the first time someone tried to execute someone in a public setting? Yes. This is the first time a public execution of a top official in a western country has ever taken place. That's a long way from the execution of Saddam Hussein in Iraq – who was executed on a stage in Baghdad before an audience of Iraqi and foreign dignitaries. And far from the public executions that took place in the USSR in the 1960s and '70s. Is this a trial of a sovereign member state? Yes. The Netherlands is a member state of the United Nations. The court sits in The Hague, but the 09e8f5149f
