All the icons in the collection are made after a very interesting sketch from the master of the nobor tradition, Polish artist Kornel Makowiecki. Kornel has tried to imagine how a typical pirate would look, dressed and otherwise. Even if the traditional image of the pirate doesn't really change a lot in the last years, his sketch is to be considered a great achievement, since it is the first truly original and modern pirate icon we have ever seen in the history of the internet. This collection contains the icons listed below. For each icon there are the 8 original 512x512 pixel icons and the 8 original 256x256 pixel icons. The search engine giant is rolling out a new feature that will allow users to say something like, "Weather" and have it turn into something more specific, like "What's the weather like?" "In Beta, we're starting to test the new @weather feature which lets you ask questions like "What's the weather like?" and it's built on the information you've already shared on Google," a Google spokesperson told The Verge in an email. While that's something Google hasn't demonstrated before, this "@weather" feature is also reminiscent of Amazon's Alexa, who can answer some basic questions about the weather like the temperature. The only way it can answer any other questions is through your own personal data, which is why the search giant says it has to resort to that, rather than asking for a wider selection of data from the National Weather Service. In all, it's simply another way for Google Home to try and get the Google Assistant at your side while you're trying to have a conversation about the weather. Unfortunately, like it did with the previous release of "Ambient Flow," Google has decided to only test the feature in a few specific states. That means you won't be able to ask what the weather is in Alaska just yet, as Google may be choosing to test the feature in areas where it thinks it's harder to guess the weather than in, say, New York. Google's promo video for the new feature features Microsoft's Cortana in the video as an example of what a good weather question might be. As you might 6a5afdab4c
