Photoshop and other digital imaging programs are powerful tools to learn. They are more powerful than the older film photography tools, but they also come with a host of new things that can be difficult to master—regardless of your skill level. Learning how to edit photographs is easier than learning how to create new raster images. Here are some things you need to know about Photoshop: You need a computer with a compatible color monitor, keyboard, and mouse. The computer can be any brand you want, but you need to make sure that it's color compatible. Don't buy a monochromatic computer monitor. Also, you need the Adobe Flash plugin for Photoshop, which can be downloaded for free at www.adobe.com/support/flashplayer/downloads.html. You need a large memory card to store your original files and all the changes. Memory cards are cheap, so you can afford to purchase several. You can also get memory cards with built-in compression to save storage space. The highest-quality images need to be stored on a hard drive or other large capacity storage device, such as a DVD-R. Keep the original files separate from the edited files. An external hard drive is best, since you can use this as a backup. You can also use a secondary hard drive or a computer as the working area for the image. If you use a notebook, you can get a slot in the lid to add a hard drive, which can also be used for storage for other files. You need a regular printer. The most common is a color laser printer, but you can do some basic black-and-white printing with other printers. Your printing needs to be compatible with the inkjet cartridges that your printer uses. You can print directly from the computer, or you can use a photocopier that is connected to your computer. You need to purchase a good set of lenses and a camera. You also need a digital camera that can take large resolution pictures, which is a fairly new thing. Having a scanner is a very nice touch. You need your own software that works with the software you're using. Photoshop Elements is free, and you can get the Adobe Creative Suite as well. If you have a standard computer, you probably have Photoshop Elements, and you can just work with it. Adobe Photoshop is required if you want to do more advanced editing, and you need the Adobe Creative Suite if you want to do the work of a

Internet Law Blog Post navigation New Privacy Rules for Apps and Website's Uploaded To Google Recently Google announced privacy rules for third parties that uploaded content or used the company's services on the internet. The internet giant has a general privacy policy that explains some areas of privacy but if a user uploads content or allows the company to collect data on its own they will need to ensure that content and data is kept private. In the announcement many detailed areas in the privacy policy were highlighted, including the importance of having control over the information you are sharing. You may have made some of the information you share on other websites publically, but do not expect any type of privacy because others are able to share information about you. When you allow a website to store data in your profile or share information with other websites this may harm your privacy in the long run. Additionally, the company's policy stated that it will share user data with other sites if it believes its users will have a good experience if it does so, and the information will also be added to the internet companies ad network to increase their ad revenue. The most interesting part of the statement was that the company would share information if the collection of information "will benefit the user in a material and direct way." The language of that last paragraph is vague and ambiguous and should not include advertising, which is a known fact for most users of the internet. Although the policy seemed to be a win for users, there are some problems with the Google's policy and with any company that tries to get users information for online business. One of the most troubling aspects of the policy was the emphasis on giving the user control of their data. A user only has control over the information, access and storing of their own data. Anything that changes in the user's info, such as the information you share, is not under the users control. A user cannot modify how their data is shared or stored, nor can they control it if it is online. Another problem with this policy is the emphasis on the trust of the user. Although a user may be able to see what is being shared and posted online, users do not have access to all the information that is posted about them. They may be able to see what is being shared but not know what is going on behind the scenes. Facebook has been criticized for their lack of transparency over the information they collect from their users. The policy seems to
