The statement from the White House said that there would be a press briefing on Monday afternoon. "Americans deserve a President who will always tell them the truth - and that's why I will release my tax returns," Mr. Trump said in a Twitter message Sunday afternoon. Mr. Trump did not address the question of whether he would release his tax returns, but his own advisers and the vice president had made clear in recent days that he would be expected to do so. While Mr. Trump initially said he would release his returns after the April 15 filing deadline, he has now chosen to go first to his private company, which would allow him to release information about his personal returns without public disclosure. Mr. Trump has offered a number of reasons for not releasing his returns. During the presidential campaign, he said he could not release them because he was being audited by the IRS. Get Breaking News Delivered to Your Inbox "I am under audit, it's an ongoing audit," he told a rally in Colorado in January 2016. "I am not required to do this, and it's a very simple form. They're not even interested in it." Mr. Trump's campaign and his private company have said they are being audited by the IRS, and White House press secretary Sean Spicer said on Friday that the IRS has informed Mr. Trump and his company that he is not under audit. The president's latest remarks followed his decision to reject recommendations from the White House counsel's office and the Justice Department and accept an invitation to a summit with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The leaders will meet on Monday in Hamburg, Germany. Mr. Trump has said that he will accept the invitation to meet with Mr. Putin, but other members of the president's team have rejected that plan. White House counselor Kellyanne Conway and Homeland Security Secretary John Kelly told CBS' "Face the Nation" on Sunday that the meeting was "extremely premature." "I think it would be wise for the president, if he's going to meet with anyone, to first determine that they're willing to meet with him," Conway said. Kelly also said that
