Failure to identify the number of C-peptide-containing cells in an insular lesion with multiple endocrine neoplasia type 1. Insular endocrine lesions are often associated with multiple endocrine neoplasia type 1 (MEN 1). We examined the presence of C-peptide-containing endocrine cells in two insular lesions from two cases of MEN 1. Insular tissue specimens were processed using immunoperoxidase staining with guinea pig anti-C-peptide and anti-glucagon monoclonal antibodies. Both specimens contained a lesion with a benign histopathological appearance and a second lesion, which was characteristically a small islet of Langerhans, exhibiting a multilayered tubulo-papillary adenoma. In the first insular lesion, the islet of Langerhans exhibited positive staining for C-peptide with no identifiable transition zone between the islet and the surrounding tissue. In the second insular lesion, the islet of Langerhans was negative for C-peptide staining and the transition zone was well delineated. From the histopathological and immunohistochemical findings, we conclude that C-peptide-containing cells are not a consistent feature of insular endocrine lesions in association with MEN 1.
