Following a week of sensational headlines and upsetting stories of death and injury, the first step to recovery must be taking a deep breath and stopping the media circus of online banter. People are concerned about how their appearance will be altered by the experience of cancer treatment and how the illness will affect their lives in future. We are all mindful of the online dangers and we all try to be responsible when online. What you can do: Be careful about what you are sharing online If you are posting something online, be careful that it is factual and it is something that you have permission to share. Make sure that you know who you are sharing something with – people may not like you if they think that you are being a jerk online. If you are posting, check to see that it is clear about what you are sharing, especially if you have a link to a website. If you are unsure if something you are sharing is true, be cautious and ask someone. Think before you post Think before you post online – is it worth it? Is it worth risking your social reputation? You may not be happy with what you find. Be mindful of the laws that you are breaking. When you share something online, it will be available for the rest of the world to see. This does not mean that it will be true, and people can easily find out the truth. Think about how you will feel when you learn that someone has shared something that is false online. Be careful about the links that you post If you have a link to a website, check that it is legitimate. Make sure that you do not post something that is not true or inaccurate. Look out for other people posting online about the same topics that you are. They may be sharing a fake story. Don't add to the noise The day to day noise of online conversation can be very distracting. Make sure that you are being responsible and not adding to the noise of online discussion. Remember, the world is changing and people are living different lives. Think about how you will be treated if you make the same mistakes that others have
