With "HyperMotion", players can use their on-pitch speed and acceleration to run past, tackle and dribble past opponents. We asked Senior Producer Arne Hendriks for a few more details on FIFA's new motion capture technology. RPS: What are the new cameras you used to capture the real life players for Fifa 22 Free Download? What sensors can they use to track the players? Hendriks: Our team of engineers and motion capture specialists went the same route as we did last year, by using camera motion capture technology that we have been using for some time now on our FIFA titles. These are mainly Vicon's OptiTrack systems, but for this year's game the engineers also worked with new camera systems we have in development - specifically, a new concept of camera systems using radar, infrared and ultrasound technologies. The basic principle is you use sensors that together with the camera see the whole area and allow you to measure the 3D path of a player in the game. RPS: That sounds like it's there to make more realistic player movements on the pitch. So this system tracks players' motions, like where they are going or where they are running, things like that?

Hendriks: Exactly. It can measure speed, acceleration, as well as how far and how much the player moves in a given time.

RPS: FIFA 21's new engine, Ignis, is fairly power intensive. Could you use the same technology from FIFA 21 to more easily capture the extra movements you have added for FIFA 22? And if that's the case, have you reached a point where the animation pipeline for the game can handle it?

Hendriks: Like we've said before, the process of developing new technology is very iterative. We've implemented certain new tech in the past and it will likely continue to evolve this year. I think the question is not so much about adding too many extra movements, but rather about adding too many extra micro-decisions. What I mean by that is, if you have more expressive character animations, you also need to make sure that everything else in the game works as it should. If you have more animations, the animation pipeline needs to be expanded in order to be able to handle it.

Hendriks: We have come
