Pr0nh4kr 3.6 full version.rarSaturday, May 3, 2012 As I discussed in my last post, the answer to the ice age/salt crisis is actually below the surface. It is found in the glacial lake, Lake Bonneville, and was discovered in 2010. According to the study by Schweingruber, Glacier Lakes, in the Circum-polar Basin, "... are endowed with some of the largest lake reserves of water in the world, and could potentially supply a significant fraction of the world's water requirements during a prolonged [Ice Age]." The consequences would be a changing pattern of the Gulf Stream, of the Great Lakes, of European waterways, etc. It would be a historical development that would directly affect the climate of the United States. The problem with the paper is the date of the discovery of the ice is only 2010. It is not an established scientific fact that Lake Bonneville existed. It is our latest mathematical discovery, and it is not plausible that a 2011 article would be focused on a mathematical discovery that was not published until 2010. Either the writer is attempting to call attention to his scientific journal, to garner publishing space, or perhaps, the paper is an attempt to call attention to the utility of data mining, an aspect of which is that certain things are not found in public records. As far as I am aware, the data mining aspect of this paper has not been published, though its generally accepted that an appropriate mathematical model is needed to develop the analytic tools for interpreting data. Thus, the author of the paper in question may merely be trying to cause attention, and to fit his data mining idea. In this particular case, it might have been an attempt to satisfy a desire to take credit for a scientist who did not necessarily solve the problem. On the other hand, it might have been an attempt to attract more funding. And we have a proven record of goldmine discoveries in the past, so it could be 1cdb36666d
