Online Audio and Video Systems by R G Gupta audio video engineering by rg gupta pdf download pdf Â· audiophileautodata online audiophileautodata italia Â· Final 2011. 04. 20. 20. 19. not the only datacenter that's under attack at the moment: GoodData reported it got an incident at their systems, too. DDoS attacks are part of the "dark network" (DDoS = Distributed Denial of Service), a term which can cover a lot of malicious hacking activities. A DDoS attack occurs when multiple bots (untrusted machines/processes) try to connect to the system, causing the system to become unavailable for regular users. This article is not a whitepaper, but a crash course on what DDoS attacks are and how they work. There are two kinds of DDoS attacks: 1. UDP flood attacks are the most common attack, in which an attacker tries to overwhelm a system with lots of incoming packets (e.g. from multiple bots). Often, this is a byproduct of a more sophisticated attack (denial of service), but the attacker is simply testing a system before he does the real thing. 2. UDP flood attacks have one target: a single IP address on a network. This explains why they happen at one particular IP address on a network. You can't divide them into two types like in the UDP flood attacks case. An advantage of UDP flood attacks is that they are easy to implement. A bot needs to only scan for UDP traffic (i.e. you can sniff all traffic like this) and output the source IP address of any packet he sees. This is the perfect pattern for a DDoS attack: simply use lots of bots and keep on attacking. It is usually much easier and quicker to launch a UDP flood attack than a more common denial of service attack, as the attacker does not need to care for a delayed response from the victim's firewall and need to keep the victim site up for a long time (as it does with denial of service attacks). For a combination of both denial of service and UDP flood, there is the LOIC attack: a tool from the LulzSec group, which can be used to perform denial of service on a target network or Internet server. If you are interested in only the denial of service part of the LOIC attack, you can use this
