This invention relates to the field of computing and, more particularly, to improved hardware and software configurable systems. Over the past decades, hardware available to consumers has become more and more complex. Devices once dedicated to a single purpose have grown into integrated systems that may perform two or more diverse functions. The complexity of integrated systems makes them an attractive target for hackers seeking to perform malicious acts such as industrial espionage, network attacks, and so forth. As a result, hardware manufacturers have worked to secure

I would like to do two operations. Method 1 would fire on mouseenter and on mouseleave, if the mouse is over the element, and Method 2 would be executed on mouseenter and on mouseleave, for the same element. I need to call Method 1, as it is fired on mouseleave, when I do not want it to be. Is this possible? I have tried with class binding, but it is not working... $('.pick').on('mouseenter', function(){ $('.pick').removeClass('hover'); $(this).trigger('mouseenter'); }); $('.pick').on('mouseleave', function(){ $(this).addClass('hover'); $(this).trigger('mouseleave'); }); function elementClick() { //do something... }; $('.pick').on('click', function(event){ $('.pick').removeClass('hover'); event.preventDefault(); elementClick(); }); $('.pick').on('mouseenter', function(){ $('.pick').trigger('mouseenter'); elementClick(); }); I know I'm having difficulties and that this seems like this question is probably very easy to do, but I can not figure it out. I have also tried to do it without class binding, without any good result, I think it is a binding problem. Thank you for your help! A: I think this is what you need: $('.pick').on({ mouseenter: function() { $(this).addClass('hover'); elementClick(); }, mouseleave: function() { $(this).removeClass('
