Pathology of indirect coagulation in complex regional pain syndrome. Complex regional pain syndrome (CRPS) is a neuropathic pain condition with various pathophysiological changes in various nerve-derived nerve fibers. One of the pathophysiological changes is the derangement of blood vessel and microcirculation, which is called secondary hyperalgesia. To understand the mechanism of indirect coagulation, which involves a blood vessel in the skin, we investigated vessel changes in the rabbit model. Pathologically, we found that the dermal vessels were maintained because of their hyperpermeability and rich blood supply. The endothelium, the basement membrane, and the muscle layers were thickened. In the internal layer, the fibroblasts and the increased capillary density were observed. The biochemical assay showed that the extracellular matrix components in the dermal vessels were swollen and disordered, and the endothelium-derived relaxing factor in the dermal vascular endothelium was reduced. These results suggest that indirect coagulation may be an important mechanism in the pathophysiology of CRPS.

The role of statins in the management of elevated lipoprotein(a) levels in primary hyperlipidaemia. Statins have a proven role in the management of elevated total cholesterol, low-density lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol and triglycerides in patients with coronary heart disease. Low-density lipoprotein (LDL) cholesterol and LDL particle size are now
