Q: How to run the docker application in my local machine? I have created the docker image of my flask web app. The image is successful to build. But I am not able to run the docker images in the local machine. The reason behind this is that I am using docker compose. so it was suggested that we should not use docker run command. Instead of using it, we should use docker-compose up command. I have used the command which I got in the #docker IRC channel. So I have tried the following: 1. dockr.local:8000 2. "localhost:8000" But didn't work. Please help me out. I am using following docker-compose.yml file for the same. version: '2' services: app: image: app_image:latest environment: - SESSION_TYPE=redis depends_on: - redis command: python app.py A: You have to run the image in your local machine. After building it, you have to run it. You can find detailed steps here: docker-compose up will start the containers and talk them to each other, but doesn't run the application inside those containers. Q: Add localhost to proxy pass I have a Jenkins server running in a docker container. When the Jenkins server starts up it needs to talk to my other services in the same docker network. I am attempting to do this using a proxy pass. proxy_pass Which gives me the following error : javax.servlet.ServletException: A proxy error: Error proxying request /, received "error reading HTTP response post:

What's New In Adobe Photoshop Exe Free Download For Windows 7?

Simultaneous removal of ammonium and phosphorus from aqueous solutions by iron-modified magnetic mesoporous biochar through dual-stage magnetic separation. A new iron-modified magnetic mesoporous biochar (Fe-MMBC) for effective adsorption of both ammonium and phosphorus from aqueous solutions is prepared by grafting magnetic mesoporous biochar (MMB) with a layer of iron oxide. The effects of the operating parameters (e.g., pH and dose of adsorbent) on the removal of phosphorus and ammonium from water were investigated. Results show that the prepared Fe-MMBC exhibits an excellent adsorption capacity for both ammonium and phosphorus removal, which is superior to that of the pristine MMB. In addition, both adsorption capacity and removal percentage of MMB for ammonium and phosphorus are affected by the pH. The removal percentage of Fe-MMBC for phosphate decreased significantly in the pH range from 2.0 to 7.0, while that of ammonium increased gradually from 1.0 to 6.0. This result indicates that the adsorption of phosphorus by Fe-MMBC is pH-sensitive, whereas the adsorption of ammonium is pH-insensitive. The adsorption behavior can be well explained by the Langmuir isotherm. The adsorption of phosphate increased with increasing initial solution concentration, which can be attributed to the cooperative adsorption effect of Ca(2+) and PO4(3-) on the surface of Fe-MMBC. The kinetic data of the adsorption processes of ammonium and phosphate can be well fitted to the pseudo-second-order model and the pseudo-first-order model, respectively. Thermodynamic analysis reveals that the adsorption of phosphate and ammonium on Fe-MMBC is spontaneous and exothermic. Furthermore, the surface area and the pore size distribution of Fe-MMBC significantly affected the adsorption capacity and removal percentage of ammonium and phosphate. The adsorption capacity and removal percentage of ammonium increased as the specific surface area and total pore volume increased. For phosphate adsorption, the decrease in total pore volume led to a decrease in the removal percentage and decrease in adsorption capacity. However, the removal percentage and adsorption capacity increased slightly as the specific surface area increased. Q: How to get rid of the 0 after you clear a QLineEdit Here I have a QLine
