Hypercalcemia in cats with renal failure, ethylene glycol, sulfite, adenine, or tetracycline intoxication: a clinicopathologic study of 44 cases (1990-2002). To characterize and compare clinicopathologic changes in cats with hypercalcemia and concurrent acute renal failure (ARF), hypercalcemia and ARF, or hypercalcemia alone from 4 different etiologies. Retrospective case series. 44 cats. Medical records and hospital discharge summaries were reviewed. Signalment, physical examination findings, gross and microscopic findings of tissues, and treatment were evaluated for cats with hypercalcemia and concurrent ARF ($n = 25$) or hypercalcemia alone (21). Affected cats from 4 etiologic groups had similar clinicopathologic changes. In cats with ARF and hypercalcemia, azotemia was more severe than in cats with hypercalcemia alone. In cats with hypercalcemia, serum concentration of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D (25(OH)D) was inversely correlated with serum concentration of ionized calcium. In cats with ethylene glycol, sulfite, or adenine intoxication, hypercalcemia was accompanied by renal failure. In cats with tetracycline intoxication, hypercalcemia was less severe and accompanied by a stronger increase in serum concentration of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D compared with cats with ethylene glycol, sulfite, or adenine intoxication. When combined, hypercalcemia and ARF were likely to be refractory to therapy. Hypercalcemia can be an isolated finding or a component of a more complex clinical condition caused by ARF in cats from various etiologic groups. Serum concentration of 1,25-dihydroxyvitamin D correlated with serum concentration of ionized calcium in cats with hypercalcemia and concurrent ARF but did not correlate with serum concentration of ionized calcium in cats with hypercalcemia alone.
