ShareScraper Description: When Hurricane Florence struck the Carolinas back in September, it was the fifth landfall in the U.S. this century. Scientists say the storm surge was the worst of any hurricane. And now that the storm has passed, the remnants of Florence continue to bring flooding, evacuations, and weather warnings. A poor swimmer. In the days following the storm, the Charlotte-area branch of the NAACP held a fundraiser for survivors of Hurricane Florence, according to The Charlotte Observer. "When a hurricane like Florence comes, it's going to wash away our trust and faith in the city government," NAACP president Rev. Dr. Anthony Johnson told the group. "We need someone to step up, someone that has not been impacted by the city's mismanagement and shady dealings, someone that has the courage to stand up, and they're here tonight," he said. The group raised $30,000 at the fundraiser. Other fundraising efforts took place in the Carolinas. One woman, Amanda Longstreet, began a GoFundMe campaign to help the storm victims. "Surviving major storms is not all fun and giggles," Longstreet wrote. "We got [sic] literally lost for four days due to the storm and experienced an absolute downpour from there to here. I can count on one hand the number of [sic] days we had no [sic] power." She asked for up to $1,000 so that she could cover items like "food, laundry, bills, getting my car fixed or replaced," and other costs. Less than 24 hours later, Longstreet had raised $9,230. By the end of the first day, she raised more than $7,000. She said it would take her about three weeks to finish the goal. The GoFundMe campaign had raised a total of more than $149,000. Barry Goldfarb, who runs the fundraising campaign on Instagram, said they have so
