HyperMotion Soccer looks more lifelike and allows players to make the ball move like it does in real life. HyperMotion Soccer enables more realistic on-pitch animations, improved ball control and an enhanced heading experience. A major focus of the new feature is the ability to use both the flick of the wrists and the direction of the hips to more accurately control the ball. My Take on FIFA 20 Changes in FIFA 22 FIFA 20 Changes in FIFA 22 In previous FIFA iterations and FUT games, players were mostly left to use computer-controlled kits and tactics, and the only real interaction we've had with players was attacking and defending. The FIFA series has become more like a real-life football experience, with players far more interactive than before, and the addition of the HyperMotion Technology should only increase this. There is the potential to really feel like you are able to play like a real player and the player's movements should help aid in that. While it's debatable whether the on-pitch behaviours are better than before, the animation does look a bit more real and the ball should be more lifelike (and much smoother, too). As well as looking more realistic, the new head movement animations should be a real issue for defending a cross, the defender should be able to rotate with the ball and make hard stops, and players should be able to more accurately pass and dribble the ball. These are all very positive steps forward for the series and further adds to the feeling of playing like a real footballer. The new game modes, options and features will help to bring the user experience in line with this. The one downside to the inclusion of HyperMotion is a potential increase in lag, although this is more likely to be an issue during live gameplay rather than when simming, or when loading from a save file. I haven't experienced any noticeable change in lag while playing online since the launch of FIFA 20, but, like earlier FIFA editions, I've noticed some pings and lags in the single-player and the Pro Clubs offline modes. Moving to the new audio and audio/visual options, players will be able to create custom-made teams or squads based on the Customisation screen. This lets users construct the squad of their dreams, with easy ways to edit rosters and kits. Those looking to customise the game further can use the options found in the Video options menu.
