Human midbrain dopaminergic neurons are cytotoxic to crystal meth blue at high concentrations. Meth has been shown to have a stronger affinity and, hence, a higher toxicity toward serotonergic neurons than amphetamine. The neurotoxicity of crystal meth blue causes negative alterations in brain structure and function, including reductions in the volume of grey matter in several brain regions and negative alterations in the markers of metabolic integrity.

crystal meth blue, which was discovered in 1893, has two enantiomers: levo-methamphetamine and dextromethamphetamine. As a CNS stimulant, levomethamphetamine is not as potent as dextromethamphetamine. Due to their potential for recreational use, dextromethorphan and methamphetamine are both inadequately handled and transported.

Since World War II, older individuals have used the man-made chemical known as crystal meth blue to stay awake and alert to danger. crystal meth blue is frequently used to cure depression and reduce weight. Currently, a tablet used to treat obesity and attention deficit hyperactivity disorder is the only legal meth product on the market (ADHD).

The poisonous substance pseudophene, which may be found in many cold medications, is used to make crystal meth blue. A chunk of transparent crystal or a dazzling blue-white rock are both forms of crystal meth blue. It is still used as a party drug and is frequently referred to as "ice" or "glass."
